

Iowa Freedom Trail Project: Individuals by Name

This is the master list of individuals currently in the Iowa Freedom Trail Project inventory files. Names in bold font indicate that an Iowa Freedom Trail Project biographical form has been completed. Names in regular font are known individuals for whom research has not yet been undertaken. Iowa Freedom Trail biographical files are available for research purposes at the Iowa History Research Center in Des Moines.

The Iowa Freedom Trail Project is an active research file at the State Historical Society of Iowa in Des Moines. The project began in 2002 when the state received funding from the National Park Service's Network to Freedom grant project. The grant provided funds for the Iowa Network to Freedom project, which focused on researching the people and places associated with the Underground Railroad and then presenting those findings to the public. Grant funding ended in 2013, but volunteers continue to research individuals associated with the Underground Railroad at the State Historical Building in Des Moines. Information is gathered from historical resources, such as newspapers, personal diaries, correspondence, and census lists, and then compiled into a form containing general information, including biographical data, resource references, associated properties, and researcher information.

Historical Sketch

The Underground Railroad was the term given to the network of people that assisted fugitive slaves attempting to escape slavery. The Underground Railroad network spanned throughout the northern and southern states with the goal of assisting fugitive slaves to freedom by getting them to the northern free states, Canada, or south of the US. Exact dates of Underground Railroad operations are unidentified, but it is thought to have operated from the late 1700s until the end of the American Civil War in 1865.

The Underground Railroad, which operated from roughly the late 18th century until the close of the Civil War in 1865 was a network of people that assisted fugitive slaves attempting to escape slavery. It spanned throughout the northern and southern states, stretching from Texas to Maine. Most fugitive slaves traveled from the Deep South north to Canada, but a small amount traveled south to Mexico and the Caribbean. During the time in which the Underground Railroad was in operation, assisting an escaped slave was considered an act of theft according to US law since slaves were legally considered property. Anyone found guilty of assisting an escaped slave was subject to fine and imprisonment.

As the Underground Railroad network formed, people took on a variety of roles within the system. Station masters, for example, hid slaves in their homes or on their property, which was often referred to as a station or depot within the network. Fugitive slaves themselves were usually referred to as passengers, cargo, fleece, or freight. Conductors were responsible for guiding fugitive slaves along the Underground Railroad routes or tracks. Others took a less active role. General agents, for example, connected fugitive slaves to people who could help them on the Underground Railroad and stockholders provided financial support to the Underground Railroad network.

Underground Railroad activity within Iowa was quite significant. The state was in a good geographic position to serve as a gateway for the Underground Railroad due to the location of Missouri, a slave state, bordering Iowa to the south, and Illinois, a free state, bordering it to the east. Additionally, the Missouri Compromise of 1820, which provided that no state north of the 36°30' parallel (besides Missouri) could enter the United States as a slave state, ensured that when Iowa became a state in 1846 that it would enter as a free state. Though not all settlers in Iowa viewed slavery as immoral, many who did come from other free states or were often associated with specific religious communities, such as the Quakers and Congregationalists who openly opposed slavery.
